What is the state of our nation's youth?

August 5, 2008

Confident or carefree? Ambitious or apathetic? What is the state of America's youth?

A fresh look at how young Americans view themselves, the country, and the quality of their education among other things, will be released Tuesday.

It reveals insight into how teens view bullying, whether teens plan to attend college, and the importance of the presidential election.

One of the most surprising elements - what teens think about themselves.

We're asking you to sound off right now on how you perceive America's youth.

What are your thoughts when it comes to the younger generation?

What challenges do you think they'll face and how are they different from your own childhood?

Or, perhaps you're a teen? Give us insight into what you feel is important or your hopes for the future. What are you most concerned about?
